"The Making of a Sailor" is absolutely fascinating. Frederick sailed and lived life aboard enthusiastically. He records the ups and downs around the world on a square rigged clipper. We see the men interacting together, the command of a ship, the life of the sailors, and operations of such a ship. The loading and unloading descriptions in Australia and Java are insightful and interesting. The sailors' trips ashore likewise. Harlow's descriptions of the management of ships really shows how complicated and highly skilled it was. All in all, this is a wonderfully engrossing tale by a man who was there and has the word expertise to describe it in wonderful detail. Highly recommend.

This is the best description of the hard life of an American sailor in the 1870s. Harlow, from New England, describes his first coastal voyage on a schooner, down the coast and up the Chesapeake and the Potomac. Then he tells of his long voyage to Australia on a square rigger. The book is fascinating and easy to read even if you don't fully understand all the nautical terms. It is well documented with sea chanteys, pictures and explanatory footnotes.
